afterwards disused, the sound expressed by it having been gradually lost from the literary language. It was a consonant, probably equivalent to English w; in the Italian alphabets derived from Greek, it appears to have passed through the power of consonantal v, to that of f, its value in the Roman alphabet: see F. It was lost in lonic and Attic before the date of the earliest known monuments, but it occurs in inscriptions in all the other dialects down to late times, and it was also retained in the literary remains of Æolic, whence the appellation Æolic digamma or Letter. Though not written in classical Greek, it can be restored on linguistic and metrical grounds in the Homeric and other ancient forms of Greek words, as fépov, work, Δift dative of Zevs, etc.

3. Math. a. Geom. A mode of linear measurement, magnitude, or extension, in a particular direction; usually as co-existing with similar measurements or extensions in other directions.

The three dimensions of a body, or of ordinary space, are length, breadth, and thickness (or depth); a surface has only two dimensions (length and breadth); a line only one (length). Here the notion of measurement or magnitude is commonly lost, and the word denotes merely a particular mode of spatial extension. Modern mathematicians have speculated as to the possibility of more than three dimensions of space.

OF.). Generally held to be:—late L. type *dis-jünare, for disjejünare to breakfast, f. dis-expressing undoing (DIs-4)+jejünium fast; the intervening stages being disj'nar, disnar, disnar.

In this view disner contains the same elements ultimately as F. dijeuner, OF. desjuner to breakfast, Disjunand owes its greater phonetic reduction (cf. aider:—L. adjülāre) to its belonging to an earlier period. The shifting of meaning whereby disner ceased to be applied to the first meal of the day, while its form ceased to recall L. jejünium or OF. jeduer, would facilitate the subsequent introduction of desjeduer with the required form and sense.]

b. Phrases. To dine forth or out to dine away from home. To dine with Duke Humphrey: to go dinnerless.

D. Phrases. To dine with Duke Humphrey: to go dinnerless.

Of this phrase the origin is not altogether clear. In the 17th c. it was associated with Old St. Paul's, London, and said of those who, while others were dining, passed their time walking in that place, or sitting in 'the chair of Duke Humphrey', or 'at Duke Humphrey's table'. According to Stowe, the monument of Sir John Beauchamp there was 'by ignorant people misnamed to be' that of Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, son of Henry IV (who was really buried at St. Albans). Nares says an (adjacent) part of the church was termed Duke Humphrey's Walk. (A different origin is however given by Fuller.) The equivalent phrase in Edinburgh appears to have been 'To dine with St. Giles and the Earl of Murray' (who was interred in St. Giles's Church): see quot. 1680, and Irving Hist. Sc. Poetry 579, 1890 SHAES. Com. Err. II. ii. 211 If any aske you for your Master, Say he dines forth. [1890 G. Harver Four Lett. (Nares s. v. Duke Humphrey.). First used in 1821 in the French form diphtherite by Bretonneau of Tours in a paper before the French Academy, published 1826; the word was taken into English and German medical literature, usually as diphtheritis, though the Fr. form was occasional in the scanty English notices of the disease before 1857. In 1855, Bretonneau in a new memoir substituted the name diphtheric, probably because terms in -ite, -itis, are properly formed on names of the part affected, as in bronchitis, laryngitis; in Eng. this was adapted as diphtheria, when 'Boulogne sore-throat' became epidemic here in 1857–88; but the adj. diphtheritic was generally retained in preference to diphtheric used by some. The transition from sense 1 to sense 3 appears to have originated in the titles of the Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus of Leibnitz 1695, containing original texts of important public documents from the 11th to 15th c, and the Corps universel diplomatique du Droit des gens of Dumont, historiographer to the Emperor, 1726, containing the original texts of 'the treaties of Alliance, of Peace, and of Commerce, from the Peace of Munster to 1709'. In these titles (as in the Codex Diplomatique, had its original meaning (sense 1 below) as applying to a body or collection of original official documents. But as the subject-matter of these particular collections was international relations, 'corps diplomatique appears to have been treated as equivalent to 'corps du droit des gens', and diplomatique taken as 'having to do with international relations, while in the fully developed sense 3 the connexion with documents disappears. This sense became established in English at the time of the French Revolution, and its French origin comes out emphatically in the writings of Burke on French affairs.]

1659 ME. also dys.) prefix, of L. origin. [L. dis-was related to bis, orig. **dois=Gr. bis twice, from duo, bio two, the primary meaning being 'two-ways, in twain'.] In L., dis-was retained in full before c, p, q, s, t, sometimes before g, h, j, and usually before the vowels, where, however, it sometimes became dir-(as in diribère=dis+habère, dirrimère=dis+emère); before f, it was assimilated, as dif-(as in dif-ferre, dif-fissus); before the other consonants, it was reduced to di-(DI-1). In late L. the full dis-was often restored instead of di-(cf. Eng. dismiss, disrupt); and the prefix itself became of more frequent use by being substituted in many words for L. de-: see De-pref. I. 6. The regular Romanic form of dis-(dif-) was des-(def-) as in OIt., Sp., Pg., Pr., OFr. In F. s (f) before a consonant became mute, and was finally dropped in writing, giving mod.F. de-. In OF. words of learned origin adopted from L., the L. dis- was usually retained; and under the influence of these, dis- was often substituted for, or used alongside of, des- in the inherited words, e.g. descorder, discorder. dis- was often substituted for, or used alongside of, des- in the inherited words, e.g. descorder, discorder. The early OF. words in English exhibit the prefix in these forms; des- prevailing in the popular words, dis- (dys-) in those of learned origin. But before the close of the ME. period, the latinized form dis- (dys-) was uniformly substituted, and des- became entirely obsolete, or was retained only in a few words in which its nature was not distinctly in a few words in which its nature was not distinctly recognized, as Descant. All words taken from L. in the modern period have dis-.

Hence, in English, dis- appears (1) as the English and French representative of L. dis- in words adopted from L.; (2) as the English representative of OF. des- (mod. F. dé-, dés-), the inherited form of L. dis-; (3) as the representative of late L dis-, Romanic des-, substituted for L. dē-; (4) as a living suffix, arising from the analysis of these, and extended to other words without respect to their origin. tended to other words without respect to their origin.

In Latin, compounds in dis- were frequently the opposites of those in com-, con-; e.g. concolor of the same colour, discolor of different colours; concordia concord, discordia discord; conjunctio joining together, disjunctio separation; compendium profit, dispendium loss; consentire to agree in feeling, dissentire to disagree in opinion, etc. In cl.L. dis- was rarely prefixed to another prefix, though disconducere to be unprofitable, is used by though discondicere to be unprohable, is used by Plautus, and disconvenire to disagree, by Horace; but in late L. and Romanic, compounds in discon, expressing the separation of elements of which com., con- expressed the junction, became very numerous; many words of this type have come down through Fr. into English, where others have been formed after them: cf. discontent, discomfit, discomfort discomfort been formed after them: cf. discoherent, discomfit, discomfort, discommend, discompose, discompound, discomment, disconsolate, discontent, discontinue.

In some words beginning with dis., the prefix is di., the s being the initial of the radical (e.g. disperse, distinguish). But by identity of phonetic change, dis- here also became des. (sometimes reduced to dis) in OF., whence also desin ME. as desperse, destincts; at the Renascence these were rectified to dis.

The following are the chief senses of dis- in Latin and English:

and English:

I. As an etymological element. In the senses:

1. 'In twain, in different directions, apart, asunder, 'hence 'abroad, away'; as discernère to discern, discutère discuss, dilapidate dilapidate, dimittère dismiss, dirumpère disrupt, dissentire dissent, distend, dividère divide.

2. 'Between, so as to separate or distinguish'; as dijidicare to dijudicate, diligère choose with a preference, love.

3. 'Separately, singly, one by one'; as dinumerare to dinumerate, disputāre dispute.

4. With privative sense, implying removal, aversion, negation, reversal of action (cf. Dz. I. 6), as discalcatus unshod, diffibulāre to unclasp, dispurēre disjon, displicēre displease, dissociāre dissociate, dissuādēre, dissuade.

5. With verbs having already a sense of division, solution, separation, or undoing, the addition of dis- was naturally intensive, 'away, out and out, utterly, exceedingly', as in disperire to perish utterly, dispudēre to be utterly ashamed, dispatēre to be utterly wearied or disgusted; hence it became an intensive in some other verbs, as dilaudāre to praise exceedingly, discupēre to desire vehemently, distauvīrī to kiss ardently. In the same way, English has several verbs in which dis-adds intensity to words having already a sense of undoing, as in disalter, distalteru, distaunui.

II. As a living prefix, with privative force.

of undoing, as in disalter, disaltern, disannul.

II. As a living prefix, with privative force.
(Extended from 4, and like F. des., de., used with verbs, substantives, and adjectives, without regard to their origin. 1899 O. Walker Oratory 31 Some Prepositions there are, which may be prefixed at pleasure, as, wa, dis, rei.)

6. Forming compound verbs (with their derivative sbs., adjs., etc.) having the sense of undoing or reversing the action or effect of the simple verb. Usually formed by the addition of diston a existing verb; sometimes, however, formed from a sb. or adj. by prefixing distant adding a verbal suffix, its., ale., fly, etc.

Most of these formations, including all the more important and permanent, are treated in their alphabetical places as Main words, e.g. DISAF-FIRM, DISESTABLISH, DISES nonce-words, examples are, disanagrammalize, disangularize, disasinate, disasinize (to deprive of asinine nature), dis Byronize, discompound, dis-deify, disdenominationalize, disdub, disexcommuni-

L. disconficere (Du Cange), f. dis-+L. conficere to put together, frame, make ready, accomplish, complete, finish; also, to finish up, destroy, consume; f. contogether + factre to do, put. In Romanic, conficere, confectare, retained the constructive sense, as in F. confire, Sp. confeitar, while disconficere, as in F. confire, Sp. confeitar, while disconficere, from Dis-4, has that of 'destroy, undo' (so Pr. desconfir, It. disconfiggere). The OF. desconfit was first taken into Eng. in its proper sense as a partirist taken into Eng. in its proper sense as a participle, and used to form a passive voice, as 'he was desconfit', i.e. completely undone; whence it was subsequently taken as the stem of a verb, desconfit-en. The pa. pple. (and pa. t.) continued to be disconfit (also -confid) till end of 15th, and occasionally till end of 16th c., but discomfited from the verb is found from 15th. For the Sc. form, see being calculated at a defined rate per cent. for the time the document has to run; practically, the interest charged by a banker or bill-discounter for advancing the value of a bill before it is due.

This is the common form in which banks and discount-houses advance money to persons engaged in commerce; the banker or discounter having thus purchased the bill at a discount keeps it till maturity, when he realizes the full amount. In practice, discount is calculated as the interest on the amount of the bill for the time it has to run; this is more than what arithmeticians call the true discount, which is reckoned as interest on the present worth (i.e. that sum which if invested at the given rate for the given time would amount to the face value).

(ed. 6) 323 With bankers and bill-discounters, discount is the interest of the sum specified, whereas, properly speaking, it is the interest of the present worth of that sum. And as the present worth of a sum due at a future time is less than the sum itself, the true discount is less than the banker's or mercantile discount; and therefore the banker obtains a small advantage.

Discredit (diskrit), a. (adv. and sb.). Forms:

Discreet (diskrit), a. (adv. and sb.). Forms: 4-6 discret, 4-7 discrete, 6-7 discrete, 5-6 Sc. discrete, 5 discrete, 5 discrete, 5 discrete, 5 discrete, 5 discrete, 5 discrete, 6 disscrete). [ME. discret, discrete, a. F. discret, 2te (12th c. in Littré), 'qui se conduit avec discrement', ad. L. discrètes, in late L. and Rom. sense: cf. It. and Sp. discrete' (discreet, wise, wary, considerate, circumspect' (Florio), 'discreet, wise to perceiue' (Minsheu). A doublet of DISCRETE, differentiated in sense and spelling.

In cl. Lat, discrètes had only the sense 'separate, distinct', as pa. pple. of discrete, whence the corresponding mod. F. sense of discrete, and Eng. DISCRETE. The late L. sense, which alone came down in popular use in Romanic, seems to have been deduced from the cognate sb. discretion-em, originally the action of separating, distinguishing, or discreting, and then the faculty of discernment; hence the adjective may have taken the sense 'possessed of discernment'.

In Eng., discrete was the prevalent spelling in all senses Discreet (diskrit), a. (adv. and sb.). Forms:

the adjective may have taken the sense 'possessed of discernment'.

In Eng., discrete was the prevalent spelling in all senses until late in the 16th c., when on the analogy of native or early-adopted words in ee from ME. close ?, as feet, sweet, beet), the spelling discreet (occasional from 1400) became established in the popular sense, leaving discrete for the scholastic and technical sense in which the kinship to L. discretus is more obvious: see Discrete. Shakspere (1st Folio) has always discreet.]
